Q 26:

A Magical Day: Imagine you or somebody woke up tomorrow and discovered they had a superpower. What is it, and how do they use it?

A1: Superpower

One morning, I woke up to find that I had a superpower that granted three wishes.

My first wish was that everything I touched would be healed. My own body, other people's bodies, and even objects would be fixed. If I touched my hair, my white, or gray, hair would turn black again. I could erase my wrinkles, and my back pain would go away.

My second wish was to become fluent in English. Then I could talk with foreigners without being nervous.

My third wish was to win the lottery, but not too much. Then I would gain enough money to live comfortably, support my four children, and build a single-story house on a hill. Then all my worries would be gone. (124 words)

My third wish was to win the lottery, but (it was] not (to win) too much.

My third wish was to win the lottery, but (I did) not (want to win) too much.

🌟 Feedback

The three wishes are clear, practical, and easy to understand.

Good specific details, such as turning gray hair black and making back pain disappear.

The wishes show concern not only for yourself but also for other people and your family.

👍 Encouragement

Your essay is warm, imaginative, and full of kindness. The most interesting idea is that your healing power can repair not only people but also objects. Your modest wish to win “but not too much” is also charming. It shows that you value a peaceful, comfortable life with your family more than great wealth.

A2:

I have always wanted to have a superpower since the invasion of Ukraine in 2022. My superpower would be this: if the leader of one country killed people in another country, I could punish that leader, and then what happened that day would be undone by the next day.

I have two reasons for wanting this superpower.

The first reason is the lack of ability and morality among some leaders. It seems that their devotion to the people and the country has shifted toward personal gain and ambition.

The second reason is the suffering of ordinary people. Many citizens have lost their lives, property, and hope because of war. My power would be the power to turn any leader who orders someone to kill back into a newborn baby.

Then, as they grew up again, they would reflect on peace.

My power would be the power to turn any leader who orders someone to kill back into a newborn baby.

my power would be the power

the power is to turn any leader back into a newborn baby

any leader orders someone to kill

🌟 Feedback

You chose a serious real-world problem and expressed a strong wish for peace.

The idea of turning a violent leader back into a newborn baby is original and memorable.

Your reasons clearly show how war affects ordinary people.

👍 Encouragement

Your essay shows compassion for people who lose their lives, homes, and hope because of war. The most powerful idea is giving leaders another chance to grow up and learn the importance of peace. It is an imaginative way of saying that people can change if they start again with better values.

A3:

I have a magic key in my brain. With this key, I can go to my special world. In that world, I was a little girl. I went to the countryside, a place I had never been before.

I walked and walked with my friend, an older girl called Tsune-chan. She lived near my house. She had to bring something to her father in the mountains. After walking for about one hour, we reached a riverside.

We crossed a small wooden bridge and went toward the mountain. Then we walked up a little more. Soon, we found a small cabin.

There was a rope with clothes hanging on it between a slim tree and another tree. We could see a big can, like an oil drum, near the cabin. It might have been used as a bath. There was an old man with a bald head and a beard. He was small. I thought he was her grandfather, but he was her father. He made rice porridge with Japanese apricot for our lunch.

He was making charcoal there. There was a charcoal kiln. There were some Iris japonica plants around it. We picked them with joy. It was a fantastic, different world for me.

I wanted to come to this place again, but I never could. So, with my magic key, I could return there after about 70 years. If I could go there again, I might be a stranger.

🌟 Feedback

The story contains many vivid details, including the wooden bridge, cabin, charcoal kiln, and rice porridge.
The setting creates a nostalgic and mysterious atmosphere.
The magic key is an effective way to connect the present with a precious childhood memory.

👍 Encouragement

Your essay feels like a journey into a treasured memory. The descriptions of Tsune-chan, her father, and life in the mountains make the special world feel real. The most touching idea is that your superpower allows you to return after about 70 years, even though you may now be a stranger there. It beautifully expresses our wish to revisit places that remain alive in our hearts.

Q 27:

Do you think Japan will have self-driving cars in the future?

A1:

Yes, of course I think so. But I'm afraid to ride in a self-driving car. I hesitate to ride in one because I think it is dangerous.

I'm sure our country suffers from a shortage of workers, including drivers. (39 words)

Feedback:
You clearly express both your opinion and your personal worry. Your point about the shortage of drivers is also useful. Adding one sentence to explain how self-driving cars could help would make your answer even clearer. Keep sharing your own ideas!

A2:

I think many Japanese people will use self-driving cars in the future. Technology is now used in various fields, and the same is true for the car market.

Humans make mistakes from time to time, so we should make use of this technology. And if it helps us, we will have a much better future. For example, people can travel far away more easily. Now, truck drivers have limited driving time and cannot carry things far away, but this problem will be solved soon.

I think we should actively use self-driving cars. (92 words)

Feedback:
Your opinion is clear, and your examples make it easy to understand. The example of truck drivers gives your essay a practical focus. Keep using specific examples to support your ideas!

A3:
Yes, I do. I think Japan will have self-driving cars in the future. I have two reasons for thinking this.

One reason is safety. I hear in the news that accidents caused by elderly drivers are increasing. People make errors, especially when they get old. It is safer to have machines make judgments and control everything.

The other reason is that, if a car runs automatically, people can relax and do something else. In addition, people can visit a town far away.

For these reasons, people will have self-driving cars in the future. (93 words)

Feedback:
Your essay has a clear structure: an opinion, two reasons, and a conclusion. This helps the reader follow your ideas easily. You also use useful expressions like "in addition." Keep building on this strong structure!

A4:

Yes, I think so. The development of self-driving cars is progressing around the world. Therefore, Japan will have them sooner or later.

Public transportation services are infrequent in the countryside. Japan's population will continue to shrink, so these services are likely to be reduced even further. People living in the countryside really need cars to go anywhere.

Self-driving cars are programmed not to break the law, and they do not have the problem of drunk driving. Thus, they can lead to fewer accidents. In that case, the elderly will not have to surrender their driver's licenses.

I'd like to try a self-driving car someday. (104 words)

Feedback:
You explain clearly why self-driving cars could help people in the countryside. Words like "therefore" and "thus" connect your ideas well. Your final sentence adds a nice personal touch. Keep it up!
